In 2008 the world's focus shifted to agricultural commodities and global food supplies as prices reached record levels. Agriculture reached the mainstream and governments and policy makers focused on food security. Climate change brings with it production uncertainty and the world's population continues to grow.

The greatest challenge is to increase food production and improve product quality in an environmentally sustainable manner. Attend CMT's AgriBiotech and Crop Protection Markets to gain insight on the latest market information, advanced technology, and regional development on crop protection.

While most companies move towards developing technologies and products that can contribute directly to improving agricultural productivity, the protection of intellectual property is crucial for crop protection companies to bring new technology on stream. What are the government's plans with regards to IPR protection?

13.3 million farmers in a record 25 countries planted 125 million hectares of biotech crops last year, the sixth largest growth spurt in 13 years of reporting. The 2 billionth cumulative acres of biotech crops also was planted in 2008, just three years after the first billionth acre, a milestone which required a decade to reach. (Source: ISAAA 2008 Annual Report).

This highlights the increasing government recognition of biotech crops or even genetically modified crops, and facilitating farmers access to it. The role of biotechnology needs to be fully understood by farmers, policy makers, regulators and consumers. Are the regimes appropriate and is the regulatory and policy environment keeping pace with the development of technology? How can policymaking be improved to ease the dissemination and commercialization of agricultural biotechnologies? With the world population expected to exceed eight billion by 2025, biotech is claimed the key to increase food production. However, what is the level of public acceptance of GM food?
